INTRODUCTION

THE following listing of communities with locally financed industrial development organizations was compiled by the Office of Area Development, U. S. Department of Commerce, and verified with appropriate State agencies, as part of a nationwide survey of these organizations.*

Over 1,800 communities currently carry on industrial development and expansion programs through formally constituted organizations, variously known as "industrial development corporations," "foundations," "funds," etc. They are concentrated for the most part in nonindustrialized regions of the country and in industrialized areas with persistent unemployment. Over 70 percent are in towns of less than 10,000 population; somewhat over 20 percent are in towns of between 10,000 and 50,000 population; and only around 5 percent are in population centers of over 50,000.

The majority of these organizations have been established since World War II. Although several factors have contributed to their spectacular spread, the compelling reason for their establishment was the need for jobs—jobs for returning veterans, for workers displaced by cutbacks in military production, and for those displaced by increasing automation, a depletion of local resources, or shifts in consumer demand.

Community leaders recognized that they were facing a situation which could no longer be solved through single or sporadic shots in the economic arm. They realized that in order to maintain the economic health of their communities it would be necessary to establish permanent organizations, endowed with funds and having flexibility to do whatever was needed to develop and expand industry. Most of the groups so established reflect this thinking. They are prepared to offer industrial sites and plant facilities for lease or sale and to extend financial and other assistance to incoming as well as established industries.

By far the largest number of these organizations was promoted and established by local chambers of commerce and most of them operate under direct chamber auspices; in effect, they serve as the chambers' financial arm in carrying out their industrial development programs.

It should be emphasized that organizations listed in the following pages are by no means the sole activators of local industrial development. In communities that do not have such bodies, other groups may perform the same functions. In a great many localities the industry committee or department of the chamber of commerce carries on local development activities. In other areas, municipal or county boards or commissions, authorized by the State, are empowered to finance industrial development programs through special appropriations or, more frequently, through local revenue bond issues.

Finally, there are additional groups—public and private alike—that sponsor industrial development activities independently or in cooperation with local development organizations. Among the public organizations are regional development groups; State development agencies, credit corporations, development authorities, and employment security agencies; port authorities and port development agencies; Federal Reserve Banks; and specialized departments of Federal Government agencies. Among the many private groups are gas and electric power companies; common carriers; commercial banks and venture capital companies; insurance companies; telephone companies; and national organizations and foundations that have a special interest in industrial development.
